The NGT FLA-RODHOLDALL-105 is a straightforward rod holdall for anglers who want a compact, budget-friendly way to carry rods safely. At 120 x 33cm, it suits shorter sessions and anglers who like a simple quiver-style carry. The alternatives below vary quite a bit, so the best choice depends on whether you want more capacity, more protection, or a more versatile carry system.

Jueachy Military Tactical Backpack 30L is the cheapest option here and the most general-purpose. Compared with the NGT holdall, it is not purpose-built for rods, so it is better for carrying tackle, clothing, bait, and accessories than for protecting made-up rods. What it does better is versatility: the MOLLE layout and backpack format make it useful for bankside walks, stalking sessions, and day trips. What it does worse is rod-specific protection and organisation. Choose this if you want an affordable rucksack that doubles for fishing, hiking, and camping, rather than a dedicated rod carrier.

Roddarch Fishing Seat Box & Rucksack is a much more specialised alternative. Compared with the NGT, it offers far more carrying utility because it combines a rucksack with a seat box setup. That makes it better for coarse anglers, match anglers, and anyone fishing longer sessions on stillwaters or canals who needs bait, terminal tackle, and a place to sit. It is heavier and less compact than the NGT holdall, and it is not the best pick if your main goal is simply to transport rods. Choose this if you want one bag to cover seat, storage, and tackle transport.

Roddarch Fishing Seat Box and Rucksack with 18 Litre ABS Tackle Box is similar, but the included tackle box makes it even more organised. Against the NGT, this is a clear upgrade for anglers who like a neat, modular setup and want better protection for small tackle. The downside is cost and bulk: it is significantly more expensive and less streamlined than a rod holdall. It suits the angler who fishes regularly from the bank and wants a proper carry system for floats, feeders, hooks, and end tackle.

NGT Carp Fishing Pop-Up Cradle is not a direct like-for-like replacement, but it is a strong alternative if your real need is fish care rather than rod transport. Compared with the NGT holdall, it is far more useful for carp anglers who fish venues where a proper unhooking mat or cradle is essential. It is better for fish safety and practical bank setup, but worse because it does nothing for rod storage. Pick this if you are building a carp kit for lakes, commercials, or syndicate waters and need a landing and unhooking solution.

NGT Jumbo Folding Carp Fishing Cradle offers similar benefits to the pop-up cradle, with a padded soft inner that gives excellent fish protection. Versus the NGT holdall, it is again a completely different tool, but one that carp anglers may value more if they fish bigger fish waters or want a more substantial unhooking station. It is bulkier and more expensive, but better for serious carp care, especially in spring and summer when fish handling matters most. Choose this if your priority is fish welfare and a sturdy cradle rather than a transport bag.

If you want the closest practical alternative to the NGT holdall, the best pick is usually a dedicated rod bag or quiver from a similar fishing brand. If you want more value for money, the tactical backpack is the cheapest way to carry kit, while the Roddarch options are better if you want a full bankside system rather than just a rod carrier.

Still Buy the Original If...

Stick with the original if you want a simple, affordable rod holdall for short sessions and easy rod transport. It is the best fit if you value a compact, no-fuss design over extra storage or multi-purpose features.
